There are two types of deadlines for applications – priority and standard deadlines.

The priority deadline represents the day an application must be complete to be considered for certain types of funding (assistantships, fellowships, or scholarships) or to be given priority consideration for admission.

The standard deadline represents the last day a complete application will be accepted; however, submitting an application by the standard deadline does not guarantee admission consideration.

Programs may close their application at any point after the priority deadline has passed. This will be indicated on program's admissions page on The Graduate College's website. Some programs may continue to accept applications after the priority deadline until the standard deadline date; however, other programs may only accept applications until the priority deadline. For more information about specific program deadline dates, visit the program's admissions page on The Graduate College website.
